(USA) When it comes to choosing a party's candidate in the voting booth, one pattern in modern American politics is so familiar it has become a truism: the rich vote Republican, the poor vote Democratic. And while the reality of the situation is much more nuanced, in broad strokes it has been the case that Republicans have consistently garnered disproportionate levels of support from the financially well-off, while the least financially secure Americans have been significantly more likely to back Democrats. Three-quarters of British people would refuse to fight for their country according to the WIN/Gallup International's End of Year survey 2014

Three-quarters of British people would refuse to fight for their country according to the WIN/Gallup International's End of Year survey 2014 conducted in the UK by our local Member ORB International and published by The International Business Times one of the leading online news services worldwide.

The question was posed to mark the centenary of first World War last year. Globally, 60% of respondents said they would be willing to fight, while 27% would not.

The British response of those willing to fight – 27%, as opposed to 51% who would not – was consistent with the results for Western Europe: 25% of West Europeans said they would take up arms, while 53% stated they would not. Italians were the most unwilling, with 68% saying they would refuse to fight.

In contrast, 44% of US respondents were willing to fight, while 77% of residents of the Middle East and North Africa were most likely to fight for their flags.

In an interview with The Times, Gary Sheffield, professor of war studies at the University of Wolverhampton said: "There's been a complete change in society's attitudes. It's related to a decline in deference – not least a tendency to no longer to trust what we are told by governments."

However, the extent of such social changes is unclear. Even during the Great War, the supply of volunteer combatants dried up. Conscription had to be introduced and lasted from 1916 to 1919. Meanwhile, conscription provided the vast majority of troops in Conscription had to be introduced, and lasted between 1916 to 1919. Meanwhile, conscription provided the vast majority of troops in the second World War. While most were compliant, a large number deserted.

More than 64,000 people from 65 countries were polled for WIN/Gallup's 38th annual global survey.

Among other notable findings, were that just 12% of Western Europeans believe that 2015 will be a year of economic success, while 42% of respondents worldwide believe this will be a prosperous year for their country. However, 70% of them say they are happy with their life, up from 60% last year.
